Research Income in Canada

Terminology note: In Canada, a Principal Investigator (PI) is defined as an individual who shares responsibility for the direction of the proposed activities. Multi-PI teams (usually 2-3 co-PIs) are common for projects that require a team science approach, with the lead grant applicant known as the “Nominated Principal Investigator” (NPI). A Co-Investigator (Co-I) is defined as an individual who contributes to the proposed activities (Co-Is are similar to Chief Investigators in Australia). Finally, there are Collaborators, whose role in the proposed activities is to provide a specific service like recruitment, and Knowledge Users, who are likely to be able to use research results to make informed decisions about health policies and programs.

Community-Based Research Teaching and Learning

My research in Canada involves working collaboratively with women living with HIV in research planning, implementation, and translation of outcomes. To support their capacity building to participate in research, I co-designed and co-taught training a comprehensive community-based research training curriculum for more than 40 women living with HIV from diverse backgrounds. This covered traditional topics related to research methods (e.g., ethics, recruitment strategies, interviewing practices, data quality, knowledge translation, community-based research principles) as well as the unique ethical tensions found in HIV and sexual health research (e.g., power in research teams, diversity of participants, traversing patient/researcher roles, unlearning prejudices, decolonizing methods, trauma-informed practice, strategies for self-care).
